Last Saturday, I went camping in the Black Forest with Harry and his dog, Coco. On our way to the lake, we saw a big old house. We were afraid. However, Coco ran into the old house, so we had to walk into the house to look for her. When we got into the house, bats flew out of the windows, and we saw spiders and strange bugs everywhere. The tables and chairs were broken. Then we found something moving under a sofa. “Is that Coco?” I asked. When I looked under the sofa, a mouse ran out. It was so scary. I fell over and cried out. Then we heard another strange noise from something big and black in the corner. Harry stood in front of me but his hands were shaking. The black thing ran towards us and Harry caught it. It was Coco under a black blanket! We took Coco out of the blanket and ran out of the house. We ran all the way back to our campsite, put down Coco, and lay down in relief. After that, we never went to the Black Forest again.

There's an old saying: dogs are loving, but cats are cold. In a new study in Japan, they found that cats – unlike dogs – don't stay away from bad strangers.

See? The dog didn't take food from the bad stranger, but to cats, food is food. You might think cats are cold and don't care about their humans. However, you think that because of anthropomorphism. You see cats as little humans, not animals with special ways of thinking. In fact, cats can't understand humans' interactions, so they don't know that some strangers are bad.

There are two reasons for that. First, cats became humans' friends later than dogs. Dogs became humans' pets 23,000 years ago, but cats began living with humans 9,600 years ago. What's more, thousands of years ago, dogs lived in groups, but most cats lived alone.

Now, we still know little about cats' thinking, but we can't let anthropomorphism drive our understanding of cats. Before we think our cats are cold, we should first try to look at the world through their eyes.
